The graph shows the probability of passing over age (in months) for Japanese and British children. The probability of passing increases with age for both groups, with Japanese children generally having a higher probability of passing at any given age compared to British children. The line for Japanese children starts at a lower probability than British children but eventually surpasses it, indicating that Japanese children have a higher likelihood of passing as they age.